Der Tod von George Floyd im Mai 2020 hat deutlich gemacht, wie sehr die USA noch mit Rassismus zu kämpfen haben. Seit den 1960er Jahren kommt es immer wieder zu Unruhen, die meistens mit harter Polizeigewalt beendet werden. In dieser kurzen Einheit blicken Ihre Lernenden auf die wichtigsten Stationen eines amerikanischen Problems, das historische Wurzeln hat und bis heute nicht gelöst ist.

The shooting of Michael Brown in Ferguson, Missouri

On 9 August, 2014 Michael Brown, an unarmed<sup>3</sup> African American teenager, was shot at least six times by Darren Wilson, a white police officer, after stealing cigarillos at a supermarket. Brown died from the injuries. Before the shooting, Brown and Wilson had a violent conflict at Wilson's car. Eyewitnesses don't agree on how exactly the shooting happened. Nevertheless, many people argued that Wilson
5 would not have shot if Brown had been white instead of black.

A nationwide debate about the police's treatment of African Americans started. When on 24 November a grand jury<sup>4</sup> decided not to indict<sup>5</sup> Officer Wilson, protests and demonstrations broke out in Ferguson and in many other cities in the USA. News teams showed images from the streets which included looting<sup>6</sup>, cars set on fire and police in riot gear<sup>7</sup> firing gunshots and using tear gas. Though 10 there were also many peaceful protesters demonstrating in Ferguson's streets, Governor Jay Nixon declared a state of emergency<sup>8</sup>.

Although the United States has made great progress to protect civil rights<sup>9</sup>, some Americans say that the nation has not yet completely succeeded.

The black fight for equal treatment

Civil rights leader Dr Martin Luther King Jr. said in his famous speech about ending racism in 1963, "I have a dream that one day this nation will rise up and live out the true meaning of its creed<sup>1</sup>: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident<sup>2</sup>; that all men are created equal ...'"
