„I don't belong to English, though I belong nowhere else“ – das Zitat Gustavo Perez Firmats, eines in Kuba geborenen U.S.-amerikanischen Schriftstellers, macht deutlich, in welch kompliziertem Verhältnis (die englische) Sprache und Identität häufig stehen. Dies gilt für speakers of English in postkolonialen Kontexten genauso wie für Immigrantinnen und Immigranten im anglophonen Sprachraum und nicht zuletzt wahrscheinlich auch für einige Ihrer Schülerinnen und Schüler. Welche Facetten das Verhältnis von Sprache und Identität haben kann, erkundet die vorliegende Unterrichtseinheit anhand aktueller Beispiele, Texte und Bilder.

M 1*What does it feel like to speak English? – English as part of identity

Talk about your attitude towards speaking English and find out what others think about speaking English.

Tasks

1. Lead in: What does speaking English feel like for you?
  - a) Take a moment to think about how speaking English feels for you.
  - b) Then walk around the room and choose a picture that comes closest to symbolising the way you feel when speaking English.
  - c) Talk to the other students who have chosen the same picture: How does it resemble your attitude towards speaking English?
2. What does speaking English feel like for others?
  - a) Read the poem by Gustavo Perez Firmat.
  - b) Paraphrase in your own words what the speaker intends to say in ll. 1–5. Do the same for ll. 6–9.

The fact that I am writing to you in English already falsifies<sup>1</sup> what I wanted to tell you.
My subject:
how to explain to you that I don't belong to English
though I belong nowhere else

© Gustavo Perez Firmat: Bilingual Blues. Bilingual Press Arizona State University 1995.

1 (to) falsify: (to) change information so that it is no longer true

The poem ...	... in my own words
The fact that I am writing to you in English already falsifies what I wanted to tell you.
My subject: how to explain to you that I don't belong to English though I belong nowhere else

Case file 2 – Actor Chet Hanks speaks Jamaican patois

M 10

Jamaica [former British colony] debates 'Queen's English'

According to some Caribbean linguists, only 1% of Jamaicans speak English as their first language. The rest speak "patois", "Creole", "Afro-English", or "Jamaican" as it's variously known. Now the government is facing demands to include protection for patois speakers in the constitution. [...] To back up his argument, he cited the case of a researcher who was treated politely by four banks in central Kingston [Jamaica] when he spoke standard English but rudely when he spoke Jamaican patois. He also referred to tests of oral comprehension of English in news broadcasts among Jamaicans that showed up to 40% did not understand them clearly.

Why does Chet Hanks speak Patois? Tom Hanks' son defends Jamaican accent in Clubhouse debate!

[...] Yesterday, he was active on a new social media app called Clubhouse, an audio-based platform where people can take part in discussions and debates in different 'rooms'. Unsurprisingly, the room Chet was in soon gained a large presence and conversation quickly turned to his use of the Jamaican accent.

"Guys, it's really as simple as this, if I get on a binge and I watch a bunch of English gangster movies, and I go around ordering a coffee at Starbucks and I'm with my friend and I go, 'Give me a latte, guvna' I'm not s***ing on English people," he said.

During the chat, Chet Hanks was questioned by users who asked if he understood the history of oppression faced by Patois speakers. However, other users defended him, with one Jamaican user even saying that "everybody back home" loves the accent. [...]

Why is that everytime Chet Hanks is trending its because of his Verbal blackface?

Tom Hanks' son Chet hits back with ANOTHER video of himself speaking Jamaican patois after footage of him at the Golden Globes was branded 'disturbing' online

Tom Hanks' son Chet has doubled down and posted another bizarre video of himself speaking Jamaican patois after getting criticized online for doing the same thing at the Golden Globes. [...]

'Me wake up this morning and see the thing turn up. Internet go mad. Respect,' he says in a put-on Caribbean accent in the new video. 'RESPECT TO MI MASSIVE,' he captioned the clip, adding 17 Jamaica flag emoji. [...] Chet joined parents and three siblings at the Golden Globes on Sunday evening [...].

That night he shared a video of himself hyping up his father while speaking Jamaican patois, an English-based creole language with West African influences.

The footage quickly went viral, and while many people were baffled, Chet went from 81,000 Instagram followers to 91,000 on Monday afternoon.

@shharine

lmao, why is Patois always the go-to language to make fun of? Like, who is this supposed to be endearing to?

2. What does speaking English feel like for others?

Suggested answers:

- b) I have to speak to you in English and that already makes it difficult to explain what I actually want to tell you. I'm trying to tell you that I don't feel comfortable speaking English / with the English culture, but I also don't feel comfortable anywhere else.
- c) The speaker has an ambivalent attitude towards the English language. He/she needs English to communicate with his/her surroundings and it is his/her only way to make himself/herself understood. At the same time, he/she does not feel comfortable using it. It has become part of his/her identity although he/she does not feel good about it. Picture 3 symbolises his/her attitude well.
- d) The speaker might be an immigrant, someone bi- or multilingual, someone who has to stay in an English-speaking country although he/she does not want to etc.

3. What does it feel like to speak English around the world?

a) Text A

- Cultural background: born in UK, moved to India when two years old, returns to UK for job; linguistic background: raised speaking (Indian) English; Urdu only used to speak to grandparents.
- English feels natural to her, it is the language Ayesha is most fluent in. But she feels annoyed by people from the UK commenting on the quality of her English because it neglects the fact that Indian English is just as English as British English and reveals the assumption that people who are not originally from the UK cannot speak English as well as people who were born and raised there.
- She feels discriminated against, self-conscious, forced to try to fit in better and burdened with the task to prove that her English skills are as good as those of people from the UK (which is particularly ironic considering the colonial background of this particular setting).
- Individual answers.

Text B

- Cultural background: French but living and working in an anglophone community; linguistic background: French native speaker who has been learning English for more than ten years.
- Loves English language but realises that she cannot get rid of her French accent. Has learned to accept that her accent is part of her identity but finds it hard to be confronted with her accent on a regular basis because it ignores the effort she put into learning the language.
- She used to feel frustrated with herself, tried to get rid of her accent and sound like a native speaker. Now, she has accepted that her accent is part of her identity.
- Individual answers.

Text C

- Cultural background: born in Cuba, moved to the USA when he was 11 years old; linguistic background: speaks English and Spanish fluently, is author and writes poems in English.
- Ambivalent attitude towards the English language; feels he is neither competent in Spanish nor in English.
- Ascribes languages to people and the relationships he has with them: Spanish as the
